

A Lullaby for Strahd

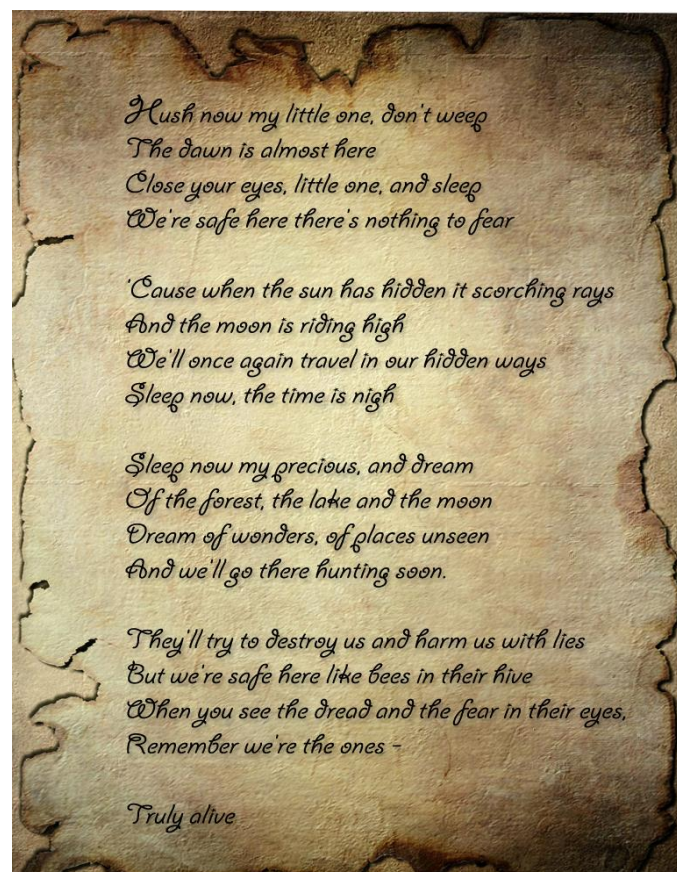

Rictavio / Rudolph Van Richten sends the party to sneak into the burgomaster's mansion in Vallaki to test their strengths. He asks them to find the lullaby that Strahd's mother had been singing to Strahd.

Strahd had given the lullaby to one of the burgomaster's to make copies of it and share it to every house of Barovia but then he got transformed into the vampire we all know and the Burgomaster thought it wise to hide it and destroy all the copies he had made instead of sharing it. The lullaby is hidden in the attic and the Baron and his family have no clue of its existence. The lullaby was written by Baba lysaga when she was still a maid and gave it to Strahd's mother but Strahd doesn't know this.

When someone reads the lullaby in Strahd's presence, then Strahd must make a DC20 wisdom saving throw or be thrown into a trance for 1d4 turns due to the memories of his mother singing to him as a child rushing in to his mind.

If the one singing the lullaby is a female or a bard, then Strahd rolls with disadvantage.

Strahd can make the save every turn after the first until he succeeds or until the duration is over and gains immunity to the lullaby for 1d10+3 years.

Hush now my little one, don't weep
The dawn is almost here
Close your eyes, little one, and sleep
We're safe here there's nothing to fear

'Cause when the sun has hidden its scorching rays
And the moon is riding high
We'll once again travel in our hidden ways
Sleep now, the time is nigh

Sleep now my precious, and dream
Of the forest, the lake and the moon
Dream of wonders, of places unseen
And we'll go there hunting soon.

They'll try to destroy us and harm us with lies
But we're safe here like bees in their hive
When you see the dread and the fear in their eyes,
Remember we're the ones -

Truly alive

Sleep now my precious
Hidden from light
Sleep little vampire child
We'll rise at dusk and rule by night
We're all that is pure and bright.
